SATURDAY, OCT. 9, 1897.

Mr. Carter's speech last night was little more than an appeal to the insular patriotic sentiments of the Hawaiians. It conveys, practically, its own answer in the conspicuous omission of replies to the many arguments advanced in favor of annexation. Not a sentence in argument that Hawaii could, with either credit to itself or safety, maintain her independence. Mr. Carter on reflection must realize, as fully as any man in this community, that independence with the confusion of counsels, the menace of anarchy, the scramble for position, the autocratic freaks of royalty, the repeated revolutions and attempts thereat, which characterized the last score of years under the monarchy, is not a condition whose preservation and perpetuation are at all to be desired. He also knows full well that the Hawaiian Islands have not had independence for a long period, even antedating the revolution of 1893, but their government has been controlled, largely, by alien minds and interests from within and without, and conspicuously subject to the foreign policy of their great neighbor with whom real union is now sought by the Republic.

PROTEST AGAINST ANNEXATION.

Memorial to the United States Passed by Mass Meeting.

Yesterday evening's mass meeting to protest against annexation filled Palace Square below the Opera House. Fifteen minutes after the opening of the meeting at 9 o'clock there were 1500 people within voice range of the platform, which was erected near the Richards street end of the square. Many continued to arrive until, about 8 o'clock, more than 2000 were in the place. Women and children made up a large proportion, and a goodly number of white faces, several being of the fair sex, were in the throng. Some prominent annexationists were noticed. Private carriages buttressed the assemblage on three sides. It was a remarkably good-natured crowd, seemingly more eager to be tickled than to be abused. Also it was a very well-mannered gathering, making the least noise disturbing to the speakers imaginable.

J. K. Kahoakano, barrister and ex-member of the Legislature, presided; and E. J. Testa, proprietor of the Makanihana, native, and the Independent, foreign, papers, acted as secretary and interpreter.

Mr. Testa read a memorial to the President, Congress and People of the United States protesting against annexation, in the name of what were claimed to be "practically the whole native Hawaiian people and a large majority of all other residents of the islands." The Provisional Government and its successor, the Republic of Hawaii, were represented as owing their existence, contrary to the will of the people as described, by force of arms.

J. K. Kaula, president of the Aloha Aina society, and Kalaokalani, president of the Hui Kalaokalani, were besides the chairman the native speakers of the evening. Kalaokalani performed a dramatic flourish with small Hawaiian and American flags, which seemed to occasion more mirth than patriotic ardor. Indeed, throughout the proceedings, there was not a fierce note in the applause of the auditors. Similar appeals under like circumstances to an Anglo-Saxon or a Latin or Celtic audience would have excited roars of passion as from bulls of Bashan.

Joseph O. Carter made the principal speech of the evening in English, interpreted into Hawaiian. From his side of the question the subject could not have been more adroitly handled. His objections to annexation were briefly as follows: It would involve the islands in disputes between foreign nations from which they had always been exempt. Sooner than imagined the United States might have a foreign war on her hands with Hawaii annexed bearing its full share of miseries. The labor system would be revolutionized to the great damage of our leading industry of sugar, while the mechanics and salesmen and bookkeepers would be submerged in an influx of competition from outside. There was no assurance that annexation would continue to the islands the advantages of reciprocity, in view of the frequent changes in tariff legislation on sugar. Neither was reciprocity certainly doomed if annexation did not come, for reciprocity with different countries was a prominent part of the protection policy of the United States. Burdens now little realized from the introduction of the American tariff would fall upon the people. Taxation would certainly be increased. In this connection, Mr. Carter said that while some of the planters willingly taxed themselves tens of thousands of dollars to promote annexation, there were lamentations from Hawaii to Niihau over the assessments of the tax assessor—for the support of "the best government these islands ever had." This sally raised cheers and laughter. He told the Hawaiians they had won the respect of the people of the United States for the patience with which they had borne wrong, and he believed the ruling annexationists here respected them for the constancy of their patriotic faith. As the offspring of American parents he was ashamed of the transactions on that square on the 17th of January 1893. In closing he urged action in all lawful ways to preserve and perpetuate Hawaiian independence.

Mr. Testa presented a resolution, which was adopted by acclamation, approving of the memorial and authorizing that copies of it be furnished to the various foreign diplomatic representatives in Honolulu. The meeting was then dismissed, having lasted an hour and three-quarters.

Sugar is up a little, several cargoes having been disposed of at 3 15-16ths.

F. G. E. Walker shows a receipt for the amount of the judgment recovered against him by Benson, Smith & Co., respecting which return of execution was filed yesterday as "unsatisfied."

Minister Cooper, being consulted by Prof. Berger, declined to allow the band to play at the sailing of the Peking tonight, as it would establish an inconvenient precedent to thus waive the band regulations.

Messrs. Geo. W. Macfarlane, flag owner of the China, Vice President Schwerin of the P. M. S. S. Co., and J. F. Hackfeld, of the P. M. S. S. and O. & O. S. S. agency, called on President Dole and the Cabinet this morning.
